Nancy Pelosi's, the House majority leader, and Senator Chuck Schumer open their press conference with a lesson to be learned about legislation.

Even then there is very little legislative potential to be gained that qualifies as political unification across party-lines: congressional deadlock is an evident norm. The contemporary democratic party resorts to impulsive decision-making to incite opposition, but at the expense of radicalizing their base to the near-extent of extreme politics (with little or no direct contact with political reality). Where varying self-interests are motivated by short-term gains.

The winning strategy is for long-term interests to side with short-term gains: to regain control of American political power from radical politics and to pacify the population by implementing authoritarian practices meant to subdue impulsive desperation. Radical politics which is based on atypical norms that are on the fringe of economic ideology. Economic ideology that is a byproduct of radical science. Yet transcendently euphoric in its unreason and political desperation.
